Many organizations within the health care industry—from physician groups to hospitals to health systems—are experiencing distress due to economic challenges, regulatory changes, technological advances, and competitive pressures. He helps clients navigate these challenges and get their businesses back on firm footing.

Jason also devotes a significant amount of his practice to the representation of creditors in distressed situations and workouts, providing counsel, negotiating resolutions, and initiating litigation, when necessary, to enforce his clients' rights. He represents creditors across a wide variety of industries, with a particular emphasis on the automotive industry, including serving as creditors' rights counsel to a Tier One auto supplier. He also assists numerous parties with buying and selling assets out of bankruptcy, and in connection with bankruptcy-related litigation, including prosecuting and successfully defending preferential transfer and fraudulent conveyance actions.

In addition to his bankruptcy practice, Jason provides general legal counsel and advice to numerous small- and middle-market businesses and business owners. His corporate work includes representing clients in connection with transactional and litigation matters. He also assists businesses and individuals with resolution of tax collection disputes.

Jason has served as an adjunct professor of law at the Michigan State University College of Law on the subject of Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization.
